

which I told to my children that I was teaching. At the end, they said, "We didn't like that story." I said, "Why?" "Well," they said, "the Crayfish got eaten." They didn't like the Fox to eat the Crayfish. There are several versions of the Crayfish. I think this is the one that you must hear, "The Crayfish and The Fox Race." Once the Crayfish was out of the water walking around in the mud near the water. The Fox was sitting very near to him. They began to talk. The Fox asked the question, "How can you get out of the water so fast?" The Crayfish said, "I'm very fast. If I had to run a race, I could do it right now." The Fox said, "What can you do to run a race? You're so slow. You can just crawl." "Well, if you don't believe me, I'll just run you a race," said the Crayfish. "All right," said the Fox, "let's do..". The Crayfish said, "All right, we'll run across seven ridges, and whoever reaches the seventh one will prove it." "All right," said the Fox. Then, they got up and went to the top of the high mountain from where they could start. They would have to go down and up and down and up seven times. As they started the race, they were staying even with each other on the starting line. When they started, the Crayfish was rather slow getting off. The Fox was ahead of him, all but for his tail. Since they (not clear) got started, the Fox's tail went right by the Crayfish, and he grabbed the very end of the tail and got upon it. The Fox was racing as hard as he could, and he was really the only one in the race because the Crayfish was riding on his tail. When they got to the seventh ridge, the Fox - there stood right beside him, the Crayfish. The Fox said to the Crayfish, "You certainly are fast." "I told you so," said
