

don't you? If we search for water, we'll have godoo." In Cherokee language, is a time when people give free time to build homes for somebody or do some community work together, and all that they expected was a good dinner. Anyway, this was what they were gonna have. He said, "We'll have a godoo and dig a deep well." All of these animals thought it was a good idea to do this because they didn't have any water. They all had to help. The Rabbit was in his elegant clothes. He was going by back and forth. He was not about to help. Finally, they stopped the rabbit. "What are you doing? Why are you going by here for? We're having a meeting. We're going to search for water and it will be very beneficial to you. We all need drink and need water." And that was what the Rabbit was told. "My clothes would get dirty and I don't like for my hands to get dirty," said the Rabbit as he went on. "When we find some water, you won't have any to drink," said the animals to the Rabbit. "That's all right. I'll get my water in the morning from the dew. I put my pail under the leaves," said the Rabbit. So, they called a godoo, and they gathered to dig the well. The Bear was the foreman. There were many of them. The animals were all digging way down deep in the ground. They had a ladder down there for them, and these diggers down there could see that there was a little water coming up. It was very far down. After they got more water coming in, they got out; but they left the ladder to use when they went to get the water. The Rabbit begin to think about how he could get some of that water. But the rule was that if anybody stole the water, he would be killed if he had not taken part. He went to the well very early one morning, and he took some bottles with him. He went down the
