Mr. Hagerstrand: There's a doctor over here.

Doctor: ---we all have this. It's just not peculiar to race. We don't want to get into the idea that we are speaking of any one group. And there is a great deal of truth in it, and, then, there's a lot of fiction in it. And it's difficult to separate the truth from the fiction and we're not always real sure. But when you're talking to people about their beliefs, then, I think we need to appreciate it and respect their beliefs. Because it is their belief and it's very real to them. And, even if they make fun of them--you have to be careful about making fun of them with them because they might take offense at it. Because many of them who believe very sincerely will outwardly, outwardly make fun of it. And, yet inwardly believe, they believe very sincerely. so even to that--you have to be careful of it.

Mr. Hagerstrand: Well, we were not commenting on the reliability or unreliability of the accuracy or like that. We were merely just discussing it. Superstition is a very unusual word perhaps and very difficult to define it. To one person, it means a nebulous area of beliefs. To somebody else, he looks at it as something that involves walking under a ladder or a black cat crossing the street or something of that nature--throwing salt over your left shoulder instead of your right, you spill it at the wrong time. It's a great area. Any other comments?
