1 7=,512

August 26, 1969

Index side A, recording time 15 min; interview time one hour.

Informant: Ross bowlin, 60-year-old full blood Charokee, Iron Post Community, Mayes County, Oklahoma

Subject:

Inthis home in the southeast corner of Mayes County, Moss looks out across the section line road into Cherokee County. Mis nearest neighbor is over a mile amay, but this is where he wants to life, away from the crowds and to be in the woodland hill country. Moss was born on Snake Creek in the Little Mock Indian Community, but has lived at different places in this area.

and fences have been one of the big changes, which came with the white man who owns nearly all of the land now. As we drive around the hill country, moss points out different places where he used to hunt, but now it is all fenced, although few people live here. He finds it nord to understand that the whiteman dont live here, but comes and fences up the land and refuses to let anyone hunt. This is the story most Indian tell - the loss of their hunting right, their way. We pass a couple of whitemen driving new pickup trucks with stock racks, but there is no exchange of greeting.

As we enter Snake Creek Canyon, Moss points out the old road that used to come from Markham Prairie and Grand River going to hose and Lowrey Prairies. Up toward the head of the banyon was a place known long ago as Dark Hollow, a forbidding stretch with high rock bluffs on either side, heavily timbered and harboring all kinds of creatures and evils the mind cared to devise.

Over on a stretch of "sodland wass tells that it was more the finast huckleterry place in the country. But no one is allowed in there now, and the "marning! Keep out!" signs on the new fence bespeak the land owner's greedy wishes. Speaking as one of them, wass says that the Cherokees have never liked to see outsiders come into their country and destroy the modiands, but the government has seen to it that there is nothing they can do about it. He says there is no longer any Cherokee Nation.

Some three miles or so northwest of his home we stop and Moss leads the way up the side of a nigh hill. Half way up there is a little flat place. Here long ago was a Cherakee burial ground. There are no markers, but each grave is outlined with stones. Here Moss tells are some of his people — Littledave, Christie, Downing, and others. As a little boy, Moss remembers the graveyerd, and down the hill and across the road there was the log building of the Flint Church.

hose tells that in the old days the older people did not tell the younger ones much about the istory of their people. Perhaps many