

down. But when a person's not educated, all these things are put within their minds and kept, and they don't rely on pencil and paper so much. And I do try to keep more things in my head. And I think this is wonderful although a person isn't educated. We say they're not educated, but that doesn't mean that they're not intelligent. They're not able to think for themselves. It doesn't mean that they're nothing. Because the older people-- even though they didn't receive an education, they were very intelligent. They knew the best ways of life. And they brought it out and taught it to the younger generations so that we might live a better life. And that we should heed their words. Like mother always said and she'd tell me what her mother had told her. And she'd tell her things and if she didn't heed the word or her words, and then later on in life she'd realize all these things that she had said to her were true. And I know my mother would say things to me and I always heeded her word because to me seem like I would just melt because all she had to do was look at me and talk to me. And I felt I was real close to my mother. Probably too close. I don't know. It just seem like we were just together, possibly because we worked together when I was doing my secretarial work there. Not work, but we were working together for the same party. And whatever she said, I felt like that was all and there was no other person that could persuade me to do anything else. And this is true. And she said, "Well, if you don't want to listen," which I always listened, but she said it this way, she said, "If you don't want to listen to what I say, then, experience is the best teacher." And I found this out so many times in life. When I try to tell somebody something and I see that they don't heed what I have said, or what I have tried to tell them for their own use, then, I just say, "I've done my best," and whatever happens will just have to happen because experience is the best teacher." I
