

(Yeah, I've heard of her many times.) (static)

Unidentified voice: ---Chelsey, Chelsey (not clear). He was working on some history.

(Yes, ma'am.)

Unidentified voice: I went with him there.

CEMETERIES

(In your travels with Frank Still, did you folks come across any of the graves of the principal chiefs of the Cherokees outside of John Ross over here?)

Georgia: No.

(Now, this is something I want to record if I can find it, where all of them are buried.)

Georgia: Well, he was doing that the day I was with him. He was writing a McSpadden history.

(Yes, ma'am. Now, there at, let's see now, you and your family (static).)

Georgia: Farris's children, I don't see one of his there. Not a stone left.

(Well, my goodness!)

Georgia: I don't know why they done it. I thought---

Unidentified voice: You mean, down there, up here?

Georgia: Yeah, um-hum, I thought I'd ask Bill sometime when I was up there.

(I can't imagine why they would do that. Course, lot of things happened.)

Georgia: They weren't very big, but they kicked them around anyway.

(Well, to me, an unmarked grave is just as important as a thousand dollar monument because I look at it maybe different from some people. That person was God's creation, and he's just as important as any president that ever lived.)

Georgia: That's right.
