

(They surely do.)

Mrs. Pennington: (Sentence unintelligible) and went to Kansas, grandfather moved away and the children had died three years after that and they never found 'em.

(Well.)

Mrs. Pennington: That's the reason I kinda feel partial to the Bluejacket cemetery. They's enough relatives and people who knew my family that it's kinda- they keep it up.

Julius: There were lots of graves out there but nobody to keep 'em up. Well, I was one of the main ones that they asked me to work. They didn't take no interest in it. There's one whole family down on the southwest side, and there's another marked grave down there.

(Well.)

Mrs. Pennington: There's five graves there. They're not marked, but I know them. I remember where they are. They're in the cemetery. They were school friends of ours. But I wouldn't like to see anyone dig into the graves 'cause I know them.

SCHOOLS

(By the way, what schools did they have out in that country before they had a school in Centralia?)

Julius: They had both schools in Centralia. There was an old subscription school passing off west of town.

Yes, that's where Jud Campbell once was the teacher.

(Well.)

Now, they called them subscription schools in those days.

(Yeah, did they call it Centralia or did it have another name?)
