

Yeah, it's about gone, and Bill Jones runs it. He runs that little store.

(What about Ned Chicken?)

Ned Chicken, they called him Casanooso, but their name was Chicken. And when they moved these graves, Ned Chicken's father and mother-- they never did dig them up and move them. They're still under the water out there. That's what Ned told me. He says they covered his mother and father up. Course, they's quite a little ways from the main lake. They are the backwater backed over them.

(I guess that's happened in a lot of places.)

Now, in the Wickliff Point up here, there's some more graves. The people that lived there are buried there are named Hunter.

(Now, is that place still there?)

Yeah, it's still there. It's growed up so much. I don't know if I could even find it.

OLD SCHOOLS - OLD COMMUNITIES

(Oh, there must have been a lot of places scattered through the country just like that. You know, that people have forgotten about old stores, you know. There used to be old country stores that have disappeared now and people have forgotten about them. And old schools and churches that's been gone a long time.)

Now, this old Requah school, you know where that's at?

(I know about where it is, yes.)

Well, it's on the way going to Strang. And it was at one time about a mile back this way on Little Mound where there is a spring at.

That was in 1895. And they moved it. It was just an old frame building
