

raise him. We've just got the one. Its been kind of hard, but still we think we've all enjoyed this life together. But it ain't always going to be that way all the time. So what we like he always tells us, ways to do and how to do and we try. 'Course we're lacking in many ways. He's got mother, too, Leonard does. But she's got lots of other children and grand-children. I think she relies on us to try to help out when we can, you know. I guess they are. They get out of hand sometimes. But they, we hope our boy sets an example for them. 'Cause someday they're going to have to go out of this world on their own. We're going to be gone. I don't want to lay down and die and worry. We'd worry. So, we'd try our best and keep up with it. He's a good boy. He minds us. Now he's grown up. He's 22 years old.

Mrs. Green: Oh, that's nice though that you two raise him right. God will look down upon him and give him a blessing. He might be blessed. If he does go to army he might where, and I hope if he does go I hope he comes back. Back to this country. Then again he may get him a job what he went to school for. Whatever course he's taking he might have to go there.

Mrs. Maker: When he finishes if he goes to the service (static) Working in the offices. That's what they want in them officer. But they need--I hope it works the way we planned. We can't tell, but they tell us he'll never go to the fighting on account of he's the only son, you know. And I feel a little better about that.

Mrs. Green: Yeah.

Mrs. Maker: But still we don't know they change things--

Mrs. Green: When they get in there why they place'em the way they want it, you know. But I hope that--he might be--went to school to take some kind of a job, you know.

Mrs. Maker: Yeah.

Mrs. Green: But that there why, I guess, that would be all right. They might give him that job over there.

Mrs. Maker: They know after he graduates he'll have, you know, all that college behind him. And we're so proud he's going to be the first full-blood Osage to graduate that University of Oklahoma. There's lot of them goes, you know, but they're not
