

Paul and them?

(Yes.)

They were at home then.

(Were they?)

Yeah. They were at home. And, oh, we used to go up there. Paul and Dave.

(Yeah.)

I guess it was. Well, they had some calves out, running out down there in the pasture. I and Jim and Roy and Lewis Gene, Billy Stanton, we all go up there, you know. Just fool around on Sunday, you know. Nothing to do. So we, they got to catching them calves and riding them, you know. I never will forget. We saddled up one of them, he was about a six month old calf, you know or maybe he was about a yearling. But anyway, he had horns, about oh, about that long. Saddled him up and Lewis Gene said he's ride it. And I never will forget that's, I mean, that was a show. Oh, Lewis, he rode him for quite a little ways but that calf finally got him. (Laughter) Oh, boy! We had a lot of fun. Course, you know, them younger calves, well, they haven't rode them to long you know. Just ride them and them jump three or four times with them and then jump off, you know. Yeah, we had quite a time. And we used to, on rainy days, like kids would, you know, boys. We'd get out and play outlaw, you know, on the horses. And we'd maybe we'd take after one, you know. And boy we'd run through that timber and around, you know. Finally they'd catch him, you know. Whoever was the outlaw. Yeah, we had lot of fun. We just made our own fun, you know, then, Leonard. We made our own.

(Well, there was nothing hardly in town to come to, was there?)

Oh, no. No, we never cared anything about coming in town. Oh, we'd come into town, once in a while, but wasn't nothing in here, you know. We could have a lot more fun out there. And we'd have horse races, you know, and everything. And we'd all gang up down there to old Bridge at Cane Rivers every Sunday. We'd gang up down there. And all them Sidemore's, first one, then another. Everybody come that was around in that community, there. And they played cards, had dice games and horse races. I don't know what all, you know. Well, we, but later on, I forget just when.
