And she never did, you krow was afraid of them or nothing. But she had a long pole ahe carried it all the time. She tried to rit it but it, growled andwhen she stop hitting that...they come and lay by her and then finally this coyote came and layed by her and kept her warm. It was really cold. And the next morning shè started out...two coyotes just follow her many days and nights. When she stopped they stopped and they just kept doing that till firally they come to a big, high rilt, "and when they was still walking and trying to get back to the Indians it began to get ( warm you know, Anc that cold weather went off. And she said, "Oh, it mgist be spring time. Being warm." and she just kept'goipg, going, . going, tjll she come tò a place way up on a hill. And this coyote stop and she sit down, she was really tired, and that soyote turn around and came close to her and wiggle his tail and pull it over, her like that. Ind hit her fàce and that coyote...his tail you know, .. and pretty. soun he growled and he set this way and the coyote just noller, holler, and she fillow him till they come to abig hill. It was a hill, not a mountain just a big hill. Anç they went to the top of it and this coyote said. he stopped and looked that way and with one of is arms he "ent like that ((pointed)) ---and when she look down that bottom was just full of Indians. That coyote took that woman lont ways and took her where the Indians live. And then he turn around and'went back---that' coyote. Then she went down and when she came down to the bottom, these mens, they were on horses, they were driving their horses to the creek to get a orink, they saw her, and she was ail dress up different that ---different than the people that were living there. They hollered and sherun, you know, and they chase her and they caught her. They brought her to the camps. They called for these peopliss you know, they said, "You all zome and see this women, ie don't know what kind of woman she is." And then he says...
