

all the time--even if it was dry. Tastes good that way, but I never did see anybody boil horse meat.

(How did the Arapahoes feel about eating horse meat--would they eat it all the time, because they like it or when they couldn't get beef--or--?)

No, just once in a while, when somebody else have horse meat, you know they used to divide up. They didn't hog the whole thing. They used to give--almost all the camp, you know. Enough for them to eat. They used to divide up. Of course if somebody want to dry it, they slice their part and dry it. I don't think they like horse meat.

(If they were going to butcher a horse to eat it, would they pick out any particular kind of animal or animal or look--?)

I don't know how they used to get these horses to butcher. A horse get hurt or something, you know, while you're using them, well, they just kill them, and whoever wants to butcher it, I guess just butcher it.

(Back when you were growing up and living with your grandmother--how often would they eat during the day--did they have three meals, like people do now?)

Yeah. Three times a day. And then if they want some kind of lunch at night they would have something like corn gravy or berry gravy, grape gravy, something like that. And they used to eat at night. Yeah.

(What--did they have meal before--like breakfast?)

Yeah.

MEALS AND FOODS EATEN

(What would they have in their morning meal?)

Well, let me tell you. Every time I eat breakfast it was bread and meat. And then at noon it was bread and meat. Supper time it was bread and meat! They didn't have this breakfast food or they didn't have no eggs. Just eat
