

by that way. Now, these positions, these chairs, where they placed they will always be theirs. Now, in due time, somewhere down the line, certainly not the days of the old people. Persons have going to have to pay for their seats. When they were gone their parents might have paid for them but it's modern you got to think of the old. So that's the word I told my group of singers here. Now this song here, it's one that our people like here today. Some good hearted people have given us food for the war dance recognition. On top of that you guys, you people have put it on for us. And I want to thank you in advance of how you might feel. Maybe there's somebody here sick and don't feel good. You're going to feel good when you hear this song. Now that is the word that I said to my people cause this war dance organization does not, we don't have no --that's one thing that, there's a dance for the women. When that organization gets started, all the men will be needing, that's a powerful meeting (not clear). I hope that someday some women will get ambitious enough to organize that Ponca Indian Association. That is the word that I said to my people. You will always understand that I preach to these boys, that they might be here they would give their own (not clear). That's what I said to my people. I want you to know what I said.

(Some man is speaking in Ponca)

(Song begins) (The rest of side one is singing)

(End of Side A)

Side Two

Singing

At this time we're going to sing a song dedicated to the Veterans of the present Vietnam conflict. I was telling the people that we were presented a flag draped over this chair here by a man who survived. So he brought this flag-- He brought it back to California. When we were out there, the boys that were--took the flag and held it for us before we even started out there. Knowing that the Indian is a very patriotic man, as they say, there were lot of good things about an Indian, in that he honors a serviceman regardless of what tribe or where he's from. They honor him. So at this time there has been a