

and he said, "Whoa, horse, whoa, horse." That old horse just kept on going you know. This cliff was just getting closer and closer, and he just remembered that he was supposed to say, "Amen." And so just 'bout the time this horse got to this edge, he said, "Amen!" And this old horse just, just started riding his hoofs, and before he went over, he just, the horse stopped. And this old rider just looked over this horse's head, you know and he looked down and seen this big old drop off; and he just wiped his forehead and he said, "Praise the Lord!" (Laughter) That's it. He said, "Praise the Lord," so there is time to say "Praise the Lord" and "Amen."

(I just can't, I can't even tell--first, let's tell who you are, and that first part of the joke you told when I didn't quite get it, but you can explain it on there. And right now, I'm interviewing John Fixico, and I'm going to ask him what tribe he is.)

I am Greek and Seminole, and mighty nice looking, I guess. I told this joke, but somehow or another, we didn't capture the first part of it, and this joke about a religious farmer selling his hores and running ad in the paper and a young man answered this call. So, you can pick it up.

A MORAL STORY ABOUT PEOPLE

And you will know what it's all about, but this next one I would like to tell you is about the Pulpit committee. There was three persons that was chosen to be on the Pulpit Committee. The chairman received a letter, and as they were having a meeting, this Chairman of this Pulpit Committee started reading this letter to them. He said, "Well, my, I have a pretty good education, but somehow or another," he said, "I had been in some places where they run me out of town. Sometimes, I have been beaten, thrown in jail." He said, "I have quite a few scars on me, from this beating, being thrown in jail, and I'm getting up that age now where I'm just getting close to the end, I guess, but I would like to answer this call. I know that you have been seeking for a pastor. I would like to put my application in. So this Chairman introduced this letter to the other members. One of the members said, "Well, I don't know who he
