

horses, you know, why on their hunting expedition when, course, they send out a scout to locate to the buffalo if there's any. And when they locate where they are, and just how the country is, you know, how the life is, report back to the chief and they got out and they lined up. Seems like, course they don't line up straight line, but they get in line, you know, and they gave everybody chance, chance of getting a buffalo or two or they, you know, so that's the way it is, you know. They give everybody equal chance. Whenever it's time, why, they give a war whoop or something, you know. That's how they get their buffaloes that way on horseback. And another thing, they have their pack horses, that their's and their pack mules. They don't need them. This pack horse, or mule is trained to follow these fast horses. See, nowadays, you know, you see in the movies, you know where their leader. they don't do that in them days. They're trained. They follow one particular horse, this pack horse, see. Whenever he's going on a hunting, well, it stays right there with him. When he kills a buffalo, why that pack horse carries the meat on the way back to camp. That's one of them interesting things about our people. I don't believe Poncas only, I don't believe every tribe has tried those things like that. So, they don't..

(Yeah, I imagine so, that they had, you know, get around to carry all this meat back to camp on these, you can't hardly carry it all by yourself, you have to have something to pull it. They had those travois too, you remember those travois they used to have?)

HUNTING STORY

Yeah, they used them in moving, you know, breaking camps from one spot.
