

See, and a certain clan, that's how they got to make their clans, you know. From the buffalo, see what they saw. Some of them saw mice there. They didn't like. They're allergic to mice, and certain part of that tongue, you know, they don't eat, you know, certain parts. Well, you know, how it goes from your people. Same way with ours, you know. So, that's how it was. They claim that how it came about that they formed clans that way. Next time, they meet him at certain place, certain time, certain things, you know, tell them what to do. And most beautiful part of the Indian stories is where they ask, "Where is God"? They knew God, you know, just so, they just like my father used to tell me about those people, how they sometimes, when every they killed a buffalo, why they say (Indian word.) I guess that means "Thank you God" cause He remembers His little ones back home, see. Maybe, they're hungry, you know. So every time he killed a buffalo, he thanks God for it, see. Way back there now, they don't do it just this day, but way back there when they had to kill a buffalo for food, why they thank God. And just like I said, you know, early in the morning they go out, and you know how they do. Indian, you know, they hold their hand up to the sky and thank God for their lives and worship God. And these people, they were aware of God. They knew God, and they use that word everywhere they go. They used that name Wah-kon-tah. They knew Wah-kon-tah from way back there. Now, these other parts, you know, just like my father says, why, our people they didn't know anything about these present day dances. Our people knew to sing songs of worship, a song of thanksgiving back there, he said. "But nowadays," he said, "These songs that came, nowadays they're man made. But back there all they do is worship God." And they were aware of God, of course, you know, that's true, like a lot of people, white people, that they don't know God. Just like, the highest
