

Just like one lady say, "Say, there's a light over there. Somebody musta turned that light on." And they say, "Awww, go to sleep. You're not supposed to see them. They don't bother you and you're not bothering them, so go to sleep."

(Leave them along.)

Yeah, leave them alone, they're all right. Well, we got them here. Let's see, about, let's see, go about two miles south on this road back here. And then, go about a mile east. In that area, boy, there used to be a lot of them there. People come in them days, you know, we used to when it's time. Why, that the part of the area where we used to use horses and buggies, you know. And that, them folks are still living. And I know they were there, and they was wanting to go in two wagons or something like that or more than two, you know, wagons. He says, "They won't bother you, but if you go by yourself, they're going bother you." So, it happened that this man and this woman were coming. And when they got to that place, you know, and then when they, when they come to, come to themselves, well, they'd be in the same place, starting place there. And he says "Let's go again," You know, they'd start the horses and that little fellow, you know, he'd lead those horses in a circle. (laughter) They noticed them, you know. Didn't hurt them you know, but he just kept them out there all night, you know. (Laughter) Kinda like a joke, you know, play a joke on them. Things happen. Those people living to this day. Learn that kinda experience, you know. And then there's a place over here. Let's see, oh, about two, three miles south, southeast of here. That's where old folks lived. Old man Horsechief, that's Simon Eagle. You know, all these Simon or McKinley and them. That's their father and David. Now these, the old folks were there cause I remember
