

used to keep our horses there too. That's one of the things they allowed us, you know. They had a big pasture. We used to turn our ponies out in the pasture. And we used to care for them. You know, take care of them. And we used to ride them on Saturdays and Sundays, you know, and holidays. And we used to live out in toward, let's see, OG & E, I guess you know that place, OG & E Plant over there next to Arkansas River. Well, we used to live there, not there, but about a mile west of that OG & E plant. And they allowed us to go to the tracks on horseback. That's as far as we're allowed to go to the track and we're not allowed to go north from there. We're allowed, we can go south clear to the White Eagle, down in there.

OUTLAWS

We're not allowed to go north for fear of outlaws in them days. I guess, you heard about them, you know, Dawton Gang, Jessie James, all them, you know. And they, just like, you tell a story about like this and like that. Some folks, Tonkawas, there was a lot of Tonkawas living in them days, you know, here. And there's a man and a wife. His name's, I forget his name now. But anyway, Chisco, yeah, that's his name. His name is Cisco, his wife were living there at the time across this Satiska (?) River. And it happened, I guess, these fellows robbed a train up there some place. They were taken out to the Osage Hills, you know, going through here. They don't go together, but they scattered out, you know, on horseback. And, I believe three of them, three of them stopped there at Cisco's home. It was nighttime. But anyway, they stopped there. He says, course, he didn't know who they were. And Indian says, "Come in, come in, out of the rain." So they came in. And they had slickers on, you know, and boots, and spurs. And they say "We're hungry." "All right," he says, "my wife gonna cook." She cook. I don't know what they had there. Then, when she prepared the meal for them,
