

Yeah.

(Were they...?)

Now, we have a car, and then sometimes the church just a mile away or two, three miles, five miles the most, still, you know, we don't get to go. But them days, you know, how cold it is and how rough the road is, we going to hitch up the horses and go to handgames some place down the ways. (Laughter) That's the way it was them days, you know. (Laughter) They had the dances, you know. They had a, well, to be organized you know, that's the, the Indians way of recreation or doings, you know. Well, they have a club, like they do now. Now, they had a, called a certain club named, they had woman's, and now, they got one I heard here, War Drums Club. You know, they had that. Whenever they're going to have a doings, you know. Like this party, this group of people put up a dance. They're going to put a food. They're going to feed us. They don't just have a refreshments and things. They have a beef, you know, and pork and a lot of stuff to eat, you know. They call the people. And whenever there's anything that, they put up a flag. That's a sign that something's going on that night, you know. (Laughter) That's the way Indians live, you know. Yeah, they have their doings, handgames, like, no, they didn't have no handgames like that. Just like I said, you know, well, they have a handgames in day time. They don't have them at night, and these dances supposed to be a war dance, well, they have them at night. Sometimes, day, but most time they have them, I don't know why it's that way, but they have them at nights. And after they get through about eight o'clock, I guess, and they eat about nine thirty or ten. They eat, you know. Everybody eats. Even outside people look in and they call them in and they give them a seat. They eat. That's the way they lived them days. And the women folks, there's a women folks,
