

(Now, was the Tomahawk Dance the one where they had these staffs?)

Yeah, that's the one. It was different company--different dance. But now they're just dancing. I could even sing out there and let my grandson dance, now.

(Do you know any of these Tomahawk songs they used to sing at that dance?)

Not very many.

(Are they anything like the songs that they sing when they do it down there?)

Yeah. Yeah. You know, these Kiowas, they just come take it away from the Arapahoes. Arapahoes had that. But they didn't use it just any time they want to. They used to have a certain time to dance that.

(When was the last time that they ever danced their own dances, the way they used to be?)

This Tomahawk Dance, the last time, they had it right north over here (near Cantonment) where that Noble's last stane (was)--on the east side. That was the last time I seen it. And it was Jim Hudson--he put it up. He put up this Gourd Dance first, down there south of Hardin at the Lime place. He was in that group. Then, after that his wife got down and I guess he pledged it, and they danced this Tomahawk Dance over here. There was all of these--like Dan Blackhorse, and Sergeant--all them, they got in. And my husband was in that group. And my aunt--Wilbert Tabor's wife--she come and asked them to go ahead and join it. She was going to, you know--but he didn't want to. You know they always have a "grandfather." Their grandfather that's been there before. He used to teach them how. And when he find out his brother was going to be his grandfather, well, he didn't want to stay. He didn't want his own
