

And she said half of the Arapahoes already come across a big river, she said. Big water. And the rest of them, when they got to the river, they disappeared. They went under the water. And just these come.

And they used to say, "the lost tribe,"--disappeared in that big water--big river. Ocean, I guess. And there was a dog. A little dog similar to sled dog. I guess he swim across. And it's hard to believe, but I guess this little dog and these other people--the rest of the Arapahoes--is going to live under the earth. See? And they used to say, "the lost tribe." And after that that's whenever they're going to get water or anything in the river, they used to throw something in there like handkerchief or dress material. Her is this--they used to throw it in there before they get their water. And my grandmother said, "Some of us come across, but the rest went under the water." And I don't know how that happened. Now it's just like the time--what's the name of that land that when they were going across that river split and they went across? ,

(Moses and the Red Sea?)

Yeah. It just reminds me of that. And that's how come, you know--and then these northern Arapahoes, they went that way and these others come this way. See, there's Northern Arapahoes and southern Arapahoes. (Do they ever tell why part of them went that way and part came this way?) No, they never did tell. Well some of them--you know, these that come down this way--they travel on ponies. Some walked. And maybe them, they just give up and they just stay there. But they had relations over there. Maybe one family's boy stayed over there and daughter, and all that like that, you know. That's why they're related. And then they were
