

So the people got up and left. And when the people had left he doctored himself but the pain didn't leave him but he began to swell. And the pain began to grow sharper and he began to swell larger. And he tried every medicine he could think of but it was still didn't work. Because the pain hadn't left him. It was still there and it was getting worse. So he called a man to his tent, and this man came in and he looked at him and he blowed on him and he began to get larger. He began to swell larger. And he said, "Oh, goodness, I'm in pain." And as the sun comes up the people would find these different people dead. And this Taloda had these insects he would turn loose and tell them to eat on these men. And this man who came in to doctor him gave him some blankets and that was the price he had paid for his doctoring. And this blanket had all kinds of birds, birds on this blanket. And as he covered himself these birds would eat those insects. And he had a hunchy idea that it was this boy. That this boy had this blanket with the birds on it. In the meantime Taloda, he was swelling more and more. And he said, "He was the one that had killed my brother." And he said, "These men that flirt with his wife, he would turn these insects on them at night and in the morning they would be dead. And that is why I have given you this God to do away with this Taloda. Just as the sun began to rise these two women got out of the tent. They left their tent and went to their mothers wherever their mothers were camping. As they left this Taloda then all at once it looks like they had heard a gun go off and this man had
