

and they began to crawl inch by inch. And he climbed down the arbor they had made. Still unnoticed because they were dancing so fast. So he got up and put him on his back and he went to these horses. And that was how he had gotten away. The story goes on. So he came to this place where these two Kiowa women told him these two horses would be. And they had dinner waiting. They had dried meat, fry bread, that was always the meal. And they were hungry. The boy was hungry and the boy was thirsty. And they had filled their stomachs. So they left and they took the horses with them. And these two women had stolen these horses for them. And that was how they had made their get away. So this one women says, don't go this way. Don't go the way you came. There is a tribe living there that is very bad. She says you all go the north route. They won't look for you. They will look for you the route you take. Go this other route. Not the route you came on. Go this route that way you will lose them and they will never find you. So the boy was so thirsty and so hungry. And the direction the women had told them to take is the one they went. So when the people found out that this boy had escaped, they did take this route this boy had come on. They didn't go the route they had left on. So the first day they went the way according to how the women had told them and when the sun had rose they also followed it like she had told them. And the people were still looking for them, combing the trees and searching the sides of the creek but they couldn't be found. So they journeyed on and they turned toward home. And they started toward home. And the nights they spent in the creeks and forest. After that they were out of danger.
