

So the sister had found out that the Gods had made a way for her to know that her brother was alive and that this young man was bringing him home. And they reached home. I don't know how many days or how many weeks but they had reached home. So the father of the boy took the boy home. And said, "Here is your boy." So the mother had began to prepare a meal. And she said, "Go get your young man who brought you home." So the young man went to the home of the boy he had brought back with him. And they began to eat. And he says, "Yes." So the sister that was living with them had said, "Well, you have won. You can take me. And many was the time they wanted to marry but I didn't want to get married." She said, "I will marry you." But the young man says, "Yes, the idea and the thought is very good." He says, "I don't have any brothers and I don't have any sisters. All I have is my grandmother, I don't wish to be married right now. Perhaps I can take you for a sister." He said, "You will be my sister for always and I will be the brother." And that is how the story goes about the young man who had gained a sister rather than a wife.

A story goes too just like a similar one to that one I just told you about this young man they also captured this young man at this Sun Dance at a Sun Dance, and he tried and he asked himself how will I get loose when these people had tied him and staked him out. And he was tied with wet rawhide and as the days passed this rawhide had dried. So he had a knife in his possession which had perhaps the Gods placed there. Perhaps the God had helped him to cut himself loose. So he had cut himself free and he had climbed off this arbor. They laid him on this little platform
