

(Well, old double-shovels.)

Uh-huh.

(And--)

You just can't hardly find.

(Those A-frame little harrows that they used to run down the middle of a corn row. You just don't see 'em anymore.)

You just can't find 'em if you don't go to the antique shop.

(That's right. Yeah. And things that we used to think that were quite common like old binders, painting equipment. It's all gone now.)

There's a little antique shop right over here across creek. It's just about a mile right straight across here, but you've got to go way around everywhere to get over there. And they've got some little harrows and plows and things like that. And my brother over here he wanted one of these little harrows. And they ask him seven or eight dollars for it.

(Well.)

He said, no. He didn't need it that bad when he seen it. She said my aunt "done went up in Kansas and got 'em."

J. J. HARRISON WAS POSTMASTER

(What district of--Is this the McKey district down in here?)

Uh-huh. McKey township.

(McKey township. Well, then, long time ago did they have a country store in this--?)

Oh yes. Right straight up the road here. Then when it moved from up here and went over yonder about a mile. Stayed over there till the people went out of business. Died out.

(Who run the store? Do you remember?)

Well, the Harrisons run this one over here. And J. D. Morris run that one over yonder. When he left up here, he went over there.
