

with the day that Moonhead died, about what happened to a couple of Quapaws-- could you tell me?)

Well, they were going home. They had been visiting up there and--with the Quapaws and attending to one of their medicine churches. And they--I think the three day church was over and they started back home, down in the Caddo country. And down by Bluejacket--down by Bluejacket, why you had to cross the railroad. And it seems though that one of their--they started to go across and one of their horses balked at this and pulled you know, the little hack back. And they nearly got killed.

(They did get killed.)

Oh yes. Well, they did--they did get killed. But anyway, those Quapaws that had followed down there, why their little horses were tired and they had to camp. And they camped down there on the river there. And while they were--they they had a lunch--they had took lunch you know with them. They didn't know where they'd light, or where they would have to eat, so they took what little lunch that they had. Coming back, why they stopped there and they said that they would have to stay all night there because it was too late you know, and the river would be deep and-- And so they got that far, and so they had lit a fire, and started to eat their lunch--what they had. I think there were two wagons--two or three. I think there was a buggy and two wagons. And they all sat down and this fire was going and all at once why they heard a noise you know, kind of a whistling noise--like, you know. And they all looked, you know and listened and they couldn't go on and eat. And they tried--started again, you know, and somebody said something, you know, just kind of a prayer like, that they were pitiful, you know and for them not to bother them, that they were going home, you know and to help them home. And so the dogs then why they quieted down--they had all run up where they were sitting. And scared them too, I guess. And so anyway, they started to eat again, and that noise was like that. Three times it went on like that you know. And they couldn't