

with a Bible. And they still go out and hold meetings in different homes in order to show the people that they are welcome to their churches. Or else into the parsonage at any time they see fit. When they need spiritual help of any kind. So that's the work that they're doing. And now they are taking people from different churches, and sending them to different meetings such as Denver and this other field, like Flagstaff, Arizona. We went through the school that the Mennonites are holding and keeping up for the Indian people to go to school to be able to become pastors. Ministers. Then we moved on to the other field where we while we visited them, in Oraibi, Arizona. There's about four churches there that are pretty close together. Still, they're having conflicts with one another. They're all Mennonite churches, and they got four churches where we just got one. The Mennonites in Montana, they have four or five workers there. We met with all of them in Denver last year. I believe it was in January. And the year before that, trying to figure out ways and means to keep our churches going here in various districts. So we're trying to figure out ways and means to fit the budget to where we can do the work here in various fields, that I have mentioned. So far we have cut down our budget to where we can just barely do the work among the Indians. But now our church is taking on more of the work upon themselves to better the movement here in the Arapaho field. I been preaching to them that they must wake up and become adults, not as children, any more. So, it's become--coming ahead now, and they beginning to know that they must support their church. And they must know that they have to have some young person to become their leader in the years to come. Because they're going to turn the work over to the Indians in a short time. When we went to Denver they mentioned that they was going to turn the work over to the Indians. And I jumped up and this is what I said: "I want all my Indian churches to have those faith so when they are ready for that movement". And they agreed with me wholeheartedly, because they have no leaders at the present time that knows that kind of work. And that can be stable and be willing to get up and meet the
