(Did he do a lot of drumming and singing at these dances?) Yeah, he used to.

-5-

(Did he ever dance himself?)

Yeah, he used to get up and dance, you know, whenever his boys would get up and dance, why he'd get up and dance with them. He was a quiet man. Oh, I wish I could know all of them. I been singing them, and it's just like I find some here and there. I been singing them and now they got away from me. Last night I was singing some. I just forget about them. They never been sung, you know, in a long time. Just some of them, you know, when they happen to think about them, they sing them. But they sing them faster than they used to.

(Who are the people living yet today that know these songs?) I don't think any of them knows them, because it was just my boys and this Tom Hawk and my old man and myself--I used to get up and sing with them, you know. And by gosh, I had better voice than what I've got now. (Where did Tom Hawk live after he settled down here in Oklahoma?) He lived over here north of Eagle City--down in the creek there. His father-in-law had a house. And the old folks all passed away, but the girl, and that's where they used to live. And they moved back up north and he died up there. And that woman's still up there. She had a girl and a boy and I guess they lost the girl. And she's just got boy up there and I guess he's married.

RABBIT DANCE AND WOLF SONGS

(Are these Rabbit Dance songs very much different from these Wolf Songs you were singing?)

Yeah, they're different. They're way different. They're something like these Round Dance songs, but slower. They're slow. Have to sing them
