

went out there and investigate the grounds, how she got killed. Somebody actually killed her. And they was hunting evidence and they found this girl's earring, I guess. He probably grab her on the neck and shook her, and the girl was wearing silver-plated earrings about that long ($2\frac{1}{2}$ "). So the police got that as evidence. They took it downtown and all the Indians were--boys, men, white people, were gambling--in the daytime. They had about ninety-nine saloons and a lot of pool halls. The pool halls were full. So this police went in there in a pool hall and held up this earring. "Hey!" Nobody know about this girl's death that's found dead yet. This policeman held up this earring to all the boys. "Anybody can identify this earring? We found it and maybe who it belongs to?" So they went up there and look at it, and it was an Indian earring. A man that's kinda weak-minded man, Les Lesserman, (?) went up there and "Hey, that's mine! I lost it." Well, they had moved both of them, I guess, and he claim the earring. So they arrested him and put him in. "They found a girl dead over there and this earring was laying right there. You're the one that killed her." "No! That's not mine. That's not mine! It don't belong to me. I was just claiming it." Well, they don't know who done the job. So they commenced to investigate. Well, the Comanches said Phillip was married to Edna. And through jealousy, or doing gambling or someway, he might have went out there and killed her. Well, they had Phillip and he was in jail. How could he kill a woman and he in jail? He killed her first and then he went back and bust a window and got in jail. This puzzled the police for a long time. They couldn't find-- They had court. His brother, Bert Looking Glass, had many cattle. So they began to sell all those cattle to get him out of jail. And they finally got him out. But it cost him--cost him a lot of money to get out. But they prove it on him, that he was the man that kill her, the court. He finally admitted, after the influence of the court--they questioned him over and over and over and somehow he couldn't stand it, so he plead guilty. Said it was him.
