

car upset and they run an ambulance over there. And they went up there and detail a bunch and turn the car back over and took it away up to the repair shop and took the men to the post hospital. The post hospital used to be a mile from the old post on the north side. They took him up there. They was dead. When they picked them up they was dead--both of them. So they haul them up there in the ambulance. They moved the car away. And of course some public poeple travelling, and there's some people was travelling on the same road and they saw the old Ford--the soldiers had moved it off to the post down there, and run it back. "Oh, look at that car turned over. Somebody really got hurt.. Oh, look at that! And just think--he busted his guts and they're hanging on the pole! Oh, it must have been terrible!" "See that guts--that man's entrails--hanging on the pole--" Well, she didn't know they was cow guts. So these men was up there and the army doctors worked on them and find out--stuck some medicine in them and they opened their eyes. Couldn't find nothing broke about them. They just stunk with the whiskey smell on them. So pretty soon the shot them some more medicine and they come to life. They got sobered up. Said, "What happened?" They said, "Well, I guess we run over a buy post and turn over. That's the last we remember." "Well, your car's back over there. You can walk home." So the dismissed them and they walked back over there. They didn't die. That Indian boy's name was Freddie Doibigh. And the white boy was Homer McDaniels. I know both of them. But everybody got the story they died after they eat the entrails, but they didn't die. The doctor brought them back to life. They was drunk, that's all they could find--they were just dead drunk and passed out. Well, that might not be it, but that's the only thing I could think of, because it's connected with those guts.

(O.K. Well, if we didn't have this thing here--the label--if you were just looking at these pictures--is there anything that those caps they're wearing would remind you of?)
