

Picture. And a large picture of this old man, Iseeo, he was standing by his tipi. And it was a recruiting sign for troopers. But the St. Louis-Globe Democrat man saw Iseeo, his picture over there, and he saw him over here and he said, "Say, you're the same man that's showing him that picture?" "Yeah." He had on a uniform. He had on a uniform and had on cavalry artillery boots and a green drab overcoat. And his uniform had . . . But he had braided hair. And he was about eighty. He couldn't hardly walk, but I had to lead him around. And this writer fellow led us out back to the edge and show up that tipi and we went up here and he said, "Yeah, that's me and that's my tipi at Fort Sill." He said, "You just stand by there and we'll take another tipi and you and him in the same picture." So they put us up there at the side of the tipi and took our picture with Iseeo and the tipi. I never did get that picture. Well, he commenced to ask us why we're on the road to Washington. Well, I told him Iseeo, he was the chief, and on that boundary hearing they're having big trial in the Supreme Court and having a big hearing over there, and he's one of the main witnesses and I was his secretary. So he was taking notes all the time. We were talking Indian. He asked a lot of questions. Well, we told him the President sent for us to be there, and all expenses paid--President Coolidge. And while we're up there, he said we're going to visit him. I guess we'll visit him while we're up there. That's how come we have that picture with President Coolidge (referring to an 8x10 glossy print he had been showing me--jj). After we give him all that information, it's time for our train so we went to catch our train and went on. Well, you know what this writer representing the paper wrote down in the St. Louis-Globe Democrat, and he wired ahead, I guess, everything what he wrote in his paper, and pictures. Some of his pictures over there. And it got in ~~and~~ then Washington Post papers and everybody knew that we was coming, especially. And when the train arrived
