

Burton. Like one I saw in Carnegie the other day, he calls me "uncle." His name was Joe Burton. But it should be Joe Aionty.

(Then you're sort of related to Philemon Berry and that family?)

Yes. Yeah, Mr. Berry--Tennison--he just calls me "brother-in-law." She's (Annie) just my cousin, but in the Indian way, I call her "sister." That's Philemon Berry's mother.

(Let's just go down the line here. Let's start with Willie Burton. Did he have children?)

Yes.

(What are his children?)

He had quite a few of them--about six, I think. His oldest daughter is Emma Apekone.

(What's his wife's name?)

She was one of those Paddlety's, Martha Paddlety (p<sup>u</sup>dit<sup>é</sup>). You know in Anadarko--the Paddlety boys? That's their sister. That's the one Willie Burton was married to.

(Who are their children?)

The oldest girl is Emma. She married to David Apekone. They live west of Carnegie now.

(And who was next after Emma?)

Let's see--that's Roy Horse's wife--I forgot her name now. I think it's Alice.

(Goes and asks his wife) Alice.

(Then after Alice--?)

After Alice they commenced to have some boys. I think the oldest one is Harry Burton. They don't use Aionty--they just use the Burt. Then Joe Burton, and Edward Burton.

(Would you call these boys your nephews?)

Yes, I call them my nephews.

(Are there any others after Edward?)

I think that's all.
