

So we go to number one in Colony. Colony, in Arapaho, is called "Falling Off." And to translate that in Arapaho we would say čáenaeni.sí beíθi' or čáeni.sbèiθi' The short cut of that was, their people was always crossing the Washita River. The banks of the Washita was so high, that when they go to crossing that they would be always falling off. Other than that, other people wouldn't be around there, but someone else from another district would be happening to come along to where they seen--those people that live around along there--which the people around Colony had lived all along the river bank of the Washita. People fell off the river to cross from one bank to another. That's what that pertains to. So the second one is Geary District. It's called, in Arapaho, "roaming horse people." Roaming horse people. Which is known as the city of Geary, by that name, and some are known as "South Canadian River People." Different band of people, like I said before--in the village, there's a family of this and that--they camped to one side. Well, they was always used to that, so when they went to scattering out--so this is what it was called--"South Canadian River People." Then from the east of Geary, along the North Canadian River to Calumet, the Arapahoes there are called "Greasy Leggings." čáebínwót.w.háeθi' -- That's Johnny Pedro and them. "Greasy Leggings." And they are known by that. When we have these benefit dances if any Arapaho's gonna be an M.C., when he goes to translate that from English to Arapaho language, there's some older people that they cannot understand English so somebody else have to come along and translate that from English to Arapaho language--so the older people will understand. Then the third district is Canton District Arapahoes--they are called "bear faces." Due to the fact that when the Oklahoma Arapahoes came from Colorado, somewhere in the Rocky Mountains they got and preserved some bear skin--a bear skin. And brought with them as a bear hide. Always cover with a bear skin. Then they were called "bear skin faces." wú.xù'eíθi' That's the Canton people. That's the three districts that we have--the major districts. That's all I know of that.
