

he seen a rabbit laying down over there. He's sitting up like this. And he went up to this rabbit and then this rabbit was sleeping sitting up. Then he went up to him and he push him in the head like that. "Hey, you not asleep," he said. "You just 'coyote-sleep'!" And then this rabbit said, "Leave me alone," he said. "You go on where you're going. Leave me alone." He's standing there. Pretty soon this rabbit went back to sleep like that. Then pretty soon this coyote lift one of his lids. He open his eye like that--both sides. And he just looks. Looks like he's asleep. "Oh, that's good," he said. "He's sleeping." He open his eye. "You going to be like that." And then after awhile he kinda flatten his face out. His nose. Kinda make it red, in here. And then push his mouth together like this--like this rabbit's got a face kinda flat and little mouth--and then he stand away and he said, "That's good. He sure look nice." And then after a while he pull his ears kinda long, you know. And then he looks at it, and then he said, "Well, that's good. He sure looks nice," he said. He kinda push him sideways. And then push his front legs. Kinda made it little shorter. And then it's a little shorter than the behind legs, you know. He kinda pull these hind legs a little longer, so the front would be short. "Well, he's good, now. He's got a tail." And he got something. He got cotton, you know--something--it's own fur. He kinda roll it up like that and he push it on the top of his tail, you know. "Oh, that's good! That cotton-tail like that. Now he looks nice!" he said. He kinda push his stomach up like that right here. He's got little stomach. "Well--" And then he run off. Well, he run off and then he went again, you know. He slept somewheres again. At night time he travels. And this rabbit got up. And he felt funny, you know. He felt funny. "Well, I'll go home and see my family, and then I'll hunt again." So he went back to his family and when he was coming, all his little ones was afraid of him. "Hey!" they said, "Something's coming! It's got long ears and little tail and it's got flat nose and big eyes!" they said. And all them little rabbits run
