STORY ABOUT A YOUNG GIRL MISTAKING A GOAT FOR HER BOY FRIEND

Well, these Indians, they used to camp, you know. They move their camps around the river, you know--around anywheres--in the hills, you know and back up where there's windbreak. I guess these people--I don't know what kind of tribe--they move. To places--just places like that. And they got pets, you know--any kind of pets. They all used to keep. Some of them, they keep goats, and some of them sheep and just any little animal what they catch, they train them, you know. Teach them. Make a little pet out of it. Well, I guess these people they sing. They have good time at night. And this lady, you know, she had a boy friend. She's just a young girl about fifteen or sixteen years old. I guess she's got boy friend. Oh, she's a little bigger than fifteen, I guess. And then finally I guess this boy--you know, her uncle, he's got a bed on the west side in the tipi. They live in a tipi. And then her mother and daddy sleeps on that south side in the tipi. And her bed's on that side. Well, her, she sleep on that side. And I guess this boy got tired singing somewhere and he came back tired, and want to go to bed. And I guess he laid down. And I guess this goat followed him from somewhere. And I guess this girl made a date. Made a date that her boy friend's going to come visit her. And then I guess this goat just keep following him around the camp, you know. Just go here and there. You know, they smell something like they chew rags or where they spill slop they lick the ground and they just keep coming. Finally--I guess the door was kinda open and then this girl look at the door, you know. That door's kinda open and she thought her boy friend was coming. She seen something white. You know white--them days--them old days--they wear sheet, these young men, when they go see their girl friend. They wear sheet. And they just go around there and just that little thing--their eyes--shows, and nobody don't know who it is. And I guess this goat open that door. And then this girl just look at that door. And it's white. And it's moonlight. And she thought that boy kinda
