

of the church but they all kind of went down, you know. Just the young people went to church. But those are the grandchildren and the sons of their folks who all passed away. And those that are living yet, they the ones that are keeping the church up.

ALLOTMENT AND FARMING OF LAND:

(Did your father farm that land?)

Oh, first time, when they have one horse. One plow, they plow their land up and they were anxious to try to work out themselves. Even the other Indians some of them work, they even raise cattle. They have horses, they tame their own horse. But now today they have cars. And they just let all those..it just went by and it's gone, but they had lease man to work their land nowa days. The lease man pays the money and he work the land and he plant what he feels like wheat cotton, or like that. Corn or anything Alfalfa. But the lease man works the farm and he pays the money to others. Cause the Indian wouldn't draw it. But lately they found out that there was oil under it and they all was,,the oil man would lease their lands to and they pay the office were the Indians could go over there and draw their money. oMy daughters mother-in-law oh, she had tanks of it, about two. But now, about ten years ago, but now that well is running dry. Because it's been a long time, I don't know how many years. West of Apache there too. Those Indians, they call them Apaches, they the ones that had oil..oil wells out there and some of them today they still are drilling them. All those tribes, the Comanches you know. All that land the governments gave them that 160 acres to the person.

(Did you get any land?)

Yes, I had one but I had to..I don't know, the older we get we have to be look out from somebody have to look out for us. So they help me to sell my place. And once the board of welfare find out that they have to look out to me, I happen to get an oil lease and my house one room and then I got money. And some of them just got a whole lot of oil lease but now it's kind of going down too. But later on they might lease some more land.
