

He said, one of his friends said, "Hurry up and throw it. Don't carry it. Hurry up and throw it. It's gonna get bright." He said, "You aren't supposed to hold on to it and run. You are supposed to throw it, quick." See, they want him to get rid of it so that other bunch--them other coyotes--could get hold of it. So he throwed it and when he throwed it, he said he throwed it on a tipi pole. And his friends said, "Oh, that's not the way you're supposed to do it. Throw it somewhere on the side of the bank, or throw it up in the air so it will go up in the air," he said. So sure enough he throw it up in the air, he said, and that is where that sun is today, he said. That's why it's bright, he said.

SAINDAY EXCHANGES CHILDREN WITH A PANTHER

That's a short one. He's telling about Sainday. He met with his friend. He was walking along again. Walking along a creek. That's what they always say about him in his stories. He's always walking. He said he met up with a panther. And the panther said, "Hey, Uncle, how come you are walking along the creek?" "Oh, I'm moseying along," he said. "Me too," he said. But Sainday said, "But I'm sure hungry," he said. And the panther said, "Well," he said, "I got ten kids." You know, he had ten little ones. He said, "They're really good hustlers. They sure can go around and hustle. They go out there and they hunt deer and they always bring them in for me." And Sainday said, "Me too. I got my ten kids." He said, "They're sure are good workers," he said. "Let's exchange," he said. "You take my ten and I'll take your ten." So the panther said, "All right! Go ahead. Take them." So he took them along. They went so far, he said, and, boy, they start bringing deer in for him. And he said, "Boy--" he was just camping out.
