

Mountain. And the other mountain back that way, they call it the Big Mountain. And they translate that. And where we went, to that "Stinking Spring," as you all call it--we call it Zodalton. Well that mountain is called by the name of that spring too. That's what he is talking about. And then that Mt. Scott, too. He said, they call that-- He is talking about how the different mountains were named, you know, that he knows how they were named. Like that spring over there and then that Longhorn Mountain. And lot of these other mountains over here that's combined with that Longhorn Mountain. And then that Mountain Scott. And he said that Ft. Sill was really supposed to be at Ft. Cobb, but they moved that. It was supposed to be an army base there, but they moved that to Ft. Sill so that is where it is at now--Ft. Sill. (Interruption) --about the people then, you know. You might say they went out to find their own home, you know, then. Before the government gave out the land. He said they were still under the government. They were still receiving rations and things. Like that. People went out different ways to find their own--their homestead rights, or something like that. They just found a place where they could feel free where they wouldn't have to be afraid of no soldiers anymore. Some tried to get out, and learn something for themselves. But they were all under the government yet. We were just waiting the word to find out what they were going to do, or what. We heard they were going to give us land, and all that. So we were all just scattered out, he said. They were just waiting around. (Another segment of T-71 played) He said right after some of them got to Ft. Sill, they started learning how to work. Like they had horses, you know. And some of them had cattle. I guess the government give them so much. And he said that he had a hard time learning how to plow, you know. I guess it was one of
