

cut out the kidneys, you know, he started to skin this buffalo. Take him home: So he told his folks, you know, about what he done, and he run the darn buffalo, in order to keep running him to get on him. And he cut it up there where the kidneys are you know and opened it ate it up and the buffalo died.

STORY ABOUT BLACK KETTLE:

(Jay now decides to tell a true story rather than stories he learned as a child. This one is about Black Kettle.)

The one that got killed over here was Cheyenne, and my brother was ...my father was...I don't know which one was the oldest one, they both have the same name. See, this Black Kettle here, they kill him over here at Cheyenne. The town named Cheyenne, in the west over here. He got killed right there. And they kind of want me to come over they're going to do like Custer, sign us up and make it up like a grave, where they buried Custer, buried him over there, you know you know. And they want this fellow the same thing, but they got to have the bones over there, skin the bones, and bury him up. But they want me to come over about that time, you know, but they got to pay me before I go over there, you know. There were just 28 camps when they killed this Black Kettle over here, the way I heard. I don't know how they kept that hat, you know. Sometime this fall they're going to fix him up good grave, just like Custer, bury him over there in Montana, or Wyoming or some place up there. They think they was buried over there, but the head...

(At this point Jay's son-in-law James Medicine Elk, decides that his father-in-law is not doing a good enough job and comes over and tell
