

story here and there. But I live up to this long, and I tell you in them days I was just child I guess, and now I'm an old lady. I got my Indian name. It means..sunrise, when that yellow, it go all over everywhere. Go over us. Why my daddy said, I guess, before I born..of course he know I was coming and my daddy said, "I got a girl or a boy coming. I've got to a name; but I seen it in a peyote." He's a big peyote man too. He said, "I seen it, and I'm going to name him or her this..that mean in a peyote meeting the sun come up and everything yellow." That's what it..my name. And the other one's named by different things. Like some of them like when they having warpath, they might done something, honor something, they name by that. But my name is in the peyote. Because my daddy seen it. That's just my name. Yea, that's where I know of.

(Louise, some of the things that I thought we might talk about today are things that you remember from the early days out here. Especially about what Anadarko was like. You could start with the time when you were a small child, where you were born and when.)

Well, we used to live out west here, close to Alden. Between Cache Creek. And my daddy had a lot of horses, you know. Horses that never been rode. Wild mares and stallions and wagon horses and buggy team, and saddle horses. He's got bunch of horses like that that I know when I first grew up. But my mother always tell me I was born sometime early in the spring. It could be in March, April, or May..one of them three months. She said finally I grew up and we leave up there like I told you. Cause there too old government house, two room government house. That's where we lived. There's some bunch of cowboys come down there and they horse-trade with my daddy. They trade horses with it. On and on. And finally, I grew up to be a big girl..oh, like such as six, seven years old. And I wasn't in school until I was eight years old. My daddy sometimes we go Apache. Hitch up the team go to Apache town. And we go over there and get our groceries and what
