

and finally he just choked him. He tied on to him and fought around and kept choking and he had that other that knife, and just pulled it out and just cut it by it's side, you know, on it's heart, and finally that bear just fall dead. He fell down, killed that bear. And boy, his arm, and the few teeth he's got make it bleed. Bleeding, and he pulled..oh, I guess one of these strings tied around the belt somewhere and he tore it off and tied his arm as best he could. And he got to make it to camp, because this Indian doctor over there he can stop the bleeding. And he got up and walked and left that bear laying over there so he could prove he killed this bear. So he walked back and went so far and he seen a man on horseback coming..no, no there's a horse standing over there eating round and he went over there and got that horse. He caught that horse because he had some rope around his waist. And all right, he got that horse, and cut that horse, and tied rope on him and jump on him and he started to go back to the camp and he seen a man coming way over there on horseback. And he met him and he said, "Hey you got my horse, how did you catch him? And here all morning I been chasing him around and try to catch him and he keep getting away from me. He come out there. How you catch him?" "Oh, he was just eating round and I went over there and caught him and I rold him." "So what's the matter with your arm? It's all bloody!" "A bear like to got me. I want to get home." "All right," he said, "You better go ahead." "My arm's just hurting me so bad, you know, you go ahead and tell them Indian doctor to fix up in that tipi and when I get home he's going to have to doctor, stop that blood. And tell him I got a horse, I can give it to him for doctor bill and my people might have to all chip in with some other material and we can give them to doctor." You know in them days they don't have money but some other stuff like that they give for doctor bill. And all right, this man went back and told the camp people and this old man and all this fellow's parents all got scared
