

was riding it around. And they would go off, those three little boys and they would go down to the creek and just play around and finally these Navajos, or Pueblos, something, they see those kids, you know, They followed them where they came from and they climbed that hill and that mountain and they was way up there on the side, and they went up that mountain and they was way up there on the side, and they went up there in the night time and told these people that this man...they was listening to them and they was talking. And this boy said, "We seen Indians down there where we was playing." "What kind of Indians?" "Well, they had their hair cut funny, like that." And he said, "You all really did see them?" And then that night they followed the, I guess they seen them go up that mountain and they went and followed them til they come to that house where they was staying and then they killed those two mens that night. Their daddy's got killed. And these two womans and those little boys they took out. They left that place and they went somewheres. They went and hid. They went long ways and then they were tiding these little deers. And this other woman rides this other man's deer and they took off. They took their meat and they carried their meat, and they carried their water. In them days, you know, they carried their water in..did you ever see inside of a cow? They had that kind of a ..they dried it, you know, and it's got a mouth about that big and then dried it. They made a bucket out of it like that a jog you know and they pour watar in it and tie it on top with a rope this deer skin rope, and they tied it and they always carried that for their water. And they took that and they carried their dry meat and they took off. And they never did find them, "for many years.
