

their house and they dress up...they had man clothes in there, Mexicans clothes, and they put that on. And they took off to Old Mexico.' And they had those horses, they had nice, pretty horses, and every time when they would come to a Mexican home, they would change their horses and leave their horses there and get nice new horses, and they just kept a goin' until they come to where there's a lot of Mexicans and they ride into town and all those Mexicans look at them and talk and instead of talking Spanish like them Mexicans they were talking Indian and they couldn't understand them and this man said, "Well, you all come and stay with us." And they stayed there for, I don't know ten or eleven years and finally they all learned how to talk Spanish those young boys. After a while when they learned how to speak Spanish...they stayed there a long time and they said one night...they had a house to themselves and they said, "What about us getting away tonight?". They said, "They treat us all right, but let's go back to the Comanches let's go look for the Comanches." And they said, "All right. How we going to get our horses out?" He said, "Well get them out tonight and we'll saddle their horses up that night after dark." And that night they got ready they got their clothes, they got some of their blankets and then they had blankets of their own you know they got those and they got their shoes. And that night way in the night when everybody was sleeping they took out and left those Mexicans and they traveled all night. And when daytime come, they were tired and they got up in a big mountain where nobody can't find them. They hide up there and when night comes that's when they travel. I don't know how many months it took them. They got lost and went this way and that way and finally they said, "I know how we could find the Comanches. We used
