

the center. Oh I left out--just before they start dancing, they pick out two boys to dance on horse back. The horses didn't dance, but they just make them walk around. They stand on each side. Here's the circle right here and the horses were back here on each side. And the drummers were always here on kinda this side, not straight west, but kinda this side.

(Little bit southwest?)

Little bit southwest, not too much, kinda a little bit off from the east, just little bit, few degrees off. And one was elected, after they went so far around he was supposed to holler someway. Maybe he was the one that imitated this wolf, when he howl way out in the prairie. This man had to holler like that. And my father was the one that used to holler.

(He was?)

Yeah. And not everybody could do that. It was kinda of a --he said, "You feel someway. You have to have the nerve to do that," he'd say. And these on a horse back sometimes they just sing they wouldn't dance. They were just singing and when the dance song was sung, well they went to each end. One went outside and --I don't remember if they both went outside or not--but before the horse--just as soon as they moved the horses around, everybody used to jumped to the center to dance. Or else he'll run over those that are kind of cheating that want to stay back. Because they got all night to dance. Some of them try to, you know, want to rest their legs. No. They were forced to dance, all of them. They all dance. There was so mank songs. Maybe one song at a time--I don't remember if it was four songs at a atime. But everytime they start this dancing songs, half way around, they were well these horses they would kinda kick their horses or whip their horses, or--these horses, by the time they got half way around they were pretty well trained. They knew just where to go and what to do. These horses. And they go back and stand at their place, and then they move on again with certain song. They sing one certain song. Then they stop at the next place. They didn't stop, now, like in our camp, they didn't have a right to stop because it was their brother's camp. They miss their brother's camp. The members of that camp, they cannot stop. They go on to the next one. And this first stop they make
