

this boy came a little bit closer. Finally he talked to him one day. He asked him where he come from and what was his name and where was his father and mother. He said, "Well, I'm a part of you," he said. "When you was born, they throw that afterbirth in the water and I growed." The little boy was like a twin, I guess. He said, "I'm your brother." Well, this little boy, he liked him, because he was all by himself. So they played together. And one day he told his mother, "Make double my lunch." Whatever she fixed for him. "Double it. Enough for two people. I always get real hungry. I'd like to eat lots," he said. But he used to give it to that "Navel". They call him Navel. So his mother, she listened to him. She brought her a large amount of food. And then he told his father, "Make another bow and arrow. This one is pretty near to break. It might break on me sometime when I'm playing." So his father made him another one. And he went and give it to his brother. So finally they got curious. His father got curious. When he went down to the water, he saw something. He seen two pairs of tracks. Where that little boy used to play, it looked like two pairs of tracks. One was a little bit shorter than the other. He measured them, I guess. And one was his son's footprints and the other was that Navel's--Hista. His were a little bit shorter than this other boy's tracks. And his father told him, "Who you all playing with down there?" "Nobody. By myself." Well, he didn't tell him he seen two tracks. So one day his father went hunting. But he switched around. I guess he came back and he sneak up on them. He waited and waited and finally this other boy came up from the water. They start playing together. And he was kind of like an animal, you might say. He could smell--he knows if other people are around. An animal or something. He's kind of like on the alert all the time, to see if anybody was
