

(Did the Cheyennes ever replace the two that they lost?)

I think they replaced the two. There's two old ones and these other two, they never got them back.

(Did you ever hear anything about how they looked--like if they had wooden points or metal points?)

Well, I wasn't supposed to ask my father, being an old timer. He used to say these things, "A woman's not supposed to talk about them or know nothing about them. In fact, women don't know nothing about them--what they look like." But one of the little boys found a white-man-made arrow. They went and put this arrowhead at the end--at the tip of this. It was an arrow. And they brought it to my father. He says, "Here, here! Whoever made this!" It kind of scared him. "You was not supposed never to imitate those arrows, if they're made like this," he said. That's the nearest I ever come to hearing about them.

(What kind of a point did that have?)

It was ~~this~~ arrowheads, what we find--stone. And he used to tell these little boys--I had two cousins and our cousin's two boys and my own sons, and other little boys like that in his family. He used to tell them never to make an arrow with this stone arrowhead.

Never. Because, he said, that's the way those Arrows are made. He said, "It's against our belief. It's against the law. Never make one like that." So, the arrow they brought, I didn't see it any more. My father must have thrown it away.

(Was the point large or small?)

It was about this big--as big as a quarter.

(Are those Arrows--the two old ones and the two new ones that they made--are they still being kept today?)
