

I told her, I said - - you know I listened to them talk, see, before I went in there, in that room and that's where I found out that she was Bonnie Parker, the out-law. So, when the ladd lady came in, I told her, I said, "You get somebody else to take care of her, Bonnie, because I can't stay her any longer." I didn't tell her what I found out see. I wasn't afraid - but Bonnie wasn't mean to women. She always mean to men and you know why she was mean to men? She hated all men. Well, she had a half sister that, you know, that married when she (Bonnie) was just tiny. And when she was eight years old, she went to stay with her sister. And her sister had this new baby. And when the baby came you know, you know, baby was born at home and Bonnie heard her sister scream. Her sister's husband and a doctor was in there with her, and Bonnie heard her scream. She told me this herself, see. She said from that day on she didn't have any use for men. Bonnie had a daughter that was left here in Oklahoma City with Clyde Barker's little boy. Clyde, what's his name? Powers or Barker or whatever his name. She was the one she got killed with, any way. Bonnie brought her little girl and Clyde's little boy and she left them with this sister of her's. But she never would tell me her sister's name. She showed me a picture of her. She was redhead and blue-eyed. Bonnie had her hair dyed red. She dyed mine red too. See, I met her later after she got up over that appendicitis. And she was real nice to me, but I was scared to death of her. Boy, I was scared like a - -

(Didn't you tell me your mother knew Jesse James' mother?)

No. Grandma.

(Your grandma. O.K.)

She knew - -

(Where was this?)
