

They divide up and give it to all the Indians. They be big camps over there everytime they ready to give rations. There be a big camp at the old town. So during that time, they used to be a Kiowa police. They call them Kiowa Police, Indian police which they call them. There was Comanches and Apaches and Kiowa. They had those police there at the old agency. They had maybe thirty or forty of them on the police force for the Indians tribes. So they all camp there at the old town. They camp there with tipis, no tents. Tipis in them days, they had nothing but tipis. Didn't have no tents like we got today. Just old tipis you know, with tipi poles. In them days when they come in from different parts of the settlement of the Indians Caddo County, well, they would bring their belongings and they'd have long poles tied under there, their tipi poles would be tied under there and then all their belongings on that tipi pole and a horse and they would bring them horse down with them dragging, no wagons. Just on them tipi poles. Wherever they settled, at that like Mt. Scott, Hobart, and Mangum all back in there in Indian settlement. All Indian live through there, they camp through there. No homes, just nothing but tipis, no tents, tipis. So they --when the rations comes then they would all come and that's the way they been traveling those days. They traveled that way for many years. Many years. So he worked there for many years and finally they got--after that well, then after he retired working on the farm, they give mules that he work over there for the government they give him mules, Big red, dark red, mules. They weighed about 1400 pounds. Those mules, big mules. They give him that, they give him wagon, they give him harness ;and they give his seed and fee d, and they give him tools. They give him everything, you know, that a farmer could use. The government gave him that. In those days we don't have plows like we have today. They got these turning polws, but in them days they had sod plows. Just a small, just about that wide and about eighteen inches wide, I
