

you being home to take care and see over these things. Tell the boys what to do." So he went ahead then, it's kind of his old age time, so he went gone down there and went and got his ex-wife, went down there and brought all her belongings his tipi and everything and he brought them down here and he put his tipi on the north side of his log house. He camped them there. Fixed up the place good for him. And she stayed there with him for many years. So finally, I don't know that he decided to go ahead and==my grand= mother and him they were talking about that one day and they wanted to buy this little place where the Indian church is now today, so my grandfather he went down there and talked to the people that was settled on that place, that claimed that place. So they lived there. So my grandfather went up there one morning to those people and he asked them, he said "All right, how many horses, how many cattles, you all want You turn this place over to me and I'll give you these horses and cattle and you all move away from there. I'm going to be good to him, because she has childrens and they'll come and stay with them. That's their home there." So the other Indians they talked it over and they told him just how many horses and how many cattle they want for it over and they told him just how many they want for it. So they made agreement, so they came on down there and they pick out the horses and they pick out the cattle. So they drove them off. Drove them down there and when they got over there, they took all their belongings and eve rything and they move away from there. They went on further west. So my grandfather went and bought that place here for his ex-wife so she camping over there, tipis over there. Then her boys came on down. She had several boys. So they moved down here with them and she lived there for many years after that and then finally she died. His ex-wife died. But now that place today that would belong to my grandfather belongs to his ex-wife. So his boy, one of his boys took over that place. The mother of that boy went and give it to him. So after that they homestead that land through
