

listening and they said that all at once they hear them dogs barking under there and those boys are hollering under there in that water. And they hear that drum beating - - it beats for so long and those boys and those dogs, they holler for so long and then they quit. They quit all at once, they quit. And they don't do and say - - they don't bark and the drum don't sound any more. Everything stops, certain time it stops. So, sure enough the chief went back and he told the other chiefs, "Sure enough, that was right. We should have obeyed him, even we didn't go in that water, we could have gone on further than we had and that would have saved a lot of our people from dying out on that terrible sickness. But they went on and camped there and stayed there for many days and many months during the winter and summer. They stayed there in a big valley full of buffaloes, deer, and game plentiful there. And they stayed there for seven years. They said they stayed there and finally the buffaloes where ever they roamed or where ever they could find those buffaloes the whole camp would go down there and they would stay down there because that was their food. That food they live on. And when they stay there, they go and get out. The menfolk get out, and they go to killing buffaloes, deers, bring their meat in and then they bring their hide back and the womans they tan those hides, they tan them fine. And they make teepees out of them. Some of them make their clothes out of them. Shoes, and also foot hair covers during the winter. So, the womans they work and they said that there would be about twenty four womens would be sitting around that big buffalo hide and they tan it - - twentyfour of them, twentyfour womans. About four or five of them would be on one hide and four or five of them would be on another one. And they make so many buffalo hides and if some one needs a teepee - - well, it take twentyfour hides to make a teepee, so they tan that many hides, tan that many hides and
